

New York's Election Shocker: Young Socialists Beat Big-Name Democrats

From: NPR World Mined: 2026-06-24 3 min read

Have you ever heard of a political upset? That's when someone nobody expected to win actually does. Well, that's exactly what happened in New York City on Tuesday! Three candidates who call themselves democratic socialists won important primary elections. Democratic socialists believe the government should do more to help people with things like healthcare and housing. The wins were a big deal because two of the winners beat Democrats who were already in Congress. The biggest shocker was Daria Avila Chevalier. She's a 32-year-old organizer who beat Adriano Espaillat, a 71-year-old congressman who's been in office for five terms. Another winner, Brad Lander, beat Rep. Dan Goldman. And Claire Valdez won an open seat. All three were supported by Mayor Zohran Mamdani, who is also a democratic socialist. He said, "A year ago, it was not the end of a political movement, it was the beginning." Supporters say voters want big changes, like taxing the rich and universal healthcare. But Republicans say this proves Democrats are becoming too extreme. These wins follow similar victories in Washington, D.C., and Los Angeles. Still, it's unclear if socialists can win in smaller towns or rural areas. For now, New York's results show that many voters especially young ones are ready for something different.

Word Treasure

political upset -- A surprise event in politics when someone who wasn't expected to win actually does.

democratic socialists -- People who believe the government should do more to help everyone with things like healthcare and housing.

primary elections -- Elections where party members choose which candidate will run in the main election.

Congress -- The part of the U.S. government where elected officials make laws.

universal healthcare -- A system where every person can get medical care, usually paid for by the government.

taxing the rich -- Making people who earn a lot of money pay more in taxes to help fund services for everyone.

Background you need

In the United States, primary elections are held to choose which candidates will represent each political party in the main election.

The Democratic Party is one of the two major parties, and 'democratic socialists' within it want more government help for things like healthcare and housing.

Adriano Espaillat (a Congressman who had served for 10 years) lost to a much younger challenger.

Zohran Mamdani (the mayor of New York City, also a democratic socialist) supported these winners.

Break it down

WHO: Darializa Avila Chevalier, Brad Lander, Claire Valdez - young democratic socialists; and defeated Congressmen Adriano Espaillat and Dan Goldman.

WHAT: These three candidates pulled off a political upset by winning primary elections in New York City.

WHERE: New York City, New York, USA.

WHY: Because many voters--especially young ones--want bold changes like universal healthcare and taxing the rich, and were ready to replace long-time politicians.

Why it matters

These elections show that even in a big city, young people can make a difference by voting for leaders who promise to change things like healthcare and housing, which might affect your family.

Questions to think about

- 1. Democratic Socialist Candidates: They believe the rich should pay more taxes so that everyone can get healthcare and housing, and they see this as a fair way to help working people.
- 2. Republican Critics: They think these ideas are too extreme and could hurt the economy, and they worry that the Democratic Party is moving too far left.
- 3. Young Voters: Many younger voters are frustrated with old politicians and excited to support new leaders who promise to tackle problems like expensive healthcare and unfair taxes.
